276 STAR STUDS

The photographer squinted through his viewfinder at the nude boy. He adjusted the focusing ring and brought the boy's image to maximum sharpness. In a flash, his vision was flooded with a variegated impression . . . of long, smooth muscle, tanned limbs lightly fringed with the finest golden down, high forehead topped by blonde hair glinting in the sunlight . . . vital youth, strong and eager in the Maytime of life.

At an earlier time — in ancient Greece, when sculpture stood as the noblest of the arts — youth on the brink of manhood was deemed one of its noblest subjects. Today, we view those marble figures with awe. We exclaim over their flawless beauty. We wonder at the skills of those early artists. We acknowledge that pitifully few artists of our time can approach the sublime expressiveness of those early artistic giants.

Even if such talent existed abundantly today, only relatively few people could afford to purchase such works of art. Photography, on the other hand, can bring beauty into the lives of most people at relatively little cost.

The photographer squinting through his viewfinder at the nude boy may, or may not fill the bill. His product may be shoddy indeed when viewed alongside the sculptors of Greece's golden age. We applaud his attempts nevertheless and urge him on. May the multiplied clicks of thousands of cameras sound as thunder through the land.
